The Bloodlest and Most Revolting Type-Heart Pierced.

Just before leaving his room in the Webster block, on Main street north of Adams, yesterday morning to go to his work, Lewis Kinnicker was informed by his wife that she had been shamefully abused by W. J. Kidd, one of their neighbors, who accused her of emptying bors, who accused her of emptying garbage in the slop sink used by the two families in common. While they were talking over the matter the letter-carrier came in with a letter from Kinnicker's special common a draft for

WITH COAGULATED BLOOD.

A representative of the Appeal who visited the scene of the murder within fifteen minutes after it occurred, found a crowd of 200 people about the street door anxious to gain admission. They were only prevented from satisfying their morbid curiosity by the presence of two policemen stationed there for the purpose by Capt. Hackett. The screams of the widow were almost enough to curdle one's blood and men who had visited the corpse came down the stairway with white, horror-struck faces. "I never saw so much blood," said one. "I had to wade in it to get out. Look at my shoes." The soles were red. He wiped them on the ground and went off shuddering. An-other passed out. The bottoms of his

"I have made np my mind not to talk about it stall." Then he recurred his former attitude, and when the mind not to talk about it at all." Then he resumed his former attitude, and when the door was closed he seemed to be solbing. The scene of the murder was then visited. The victim lay across the threshold of his own door, partly upon his face, with his hands spread out in a pool of his own blood. A heavy, thick stream had found its way nearly to the center of his own room and another flowed out into the hall. It had been tracked all over the room and the hall down the steps and out

The victim was about thirty-eight years old, a painter, and a hard working, quiet man. The murderer is about the same age, and is employed by the Memphis and Charleston railroad. He is ugly and uarrelsome always, were crimson. There was blood on his boots and on the front of his clothes. "It is awful," he said, and would not stop until he reached the station-house, where he scoured his hands. Then he repeated the testimony, the substance of which is given above. The Appeal man walked back to the "cage" where Kidd was confined. The murderer sat with his back to the door, his head buried in his hands. He wore a white shirt. The sleeves were smeared with the blood of his victim. He was asked if he desired
